Nuclear hyperfine interactions with magnetically polarized electrons give rise to nuclear magnetic resonance shifts, which may be used to identify and analyze the electronic structures of metals and other materials. [The SC10 indicates that this paper has been cited in over 210 publications since 1956.]